Not illustrated. 1894 Excerpt: ... Even with her face cruel, she looked so winsome! And then to be alone with her--when he could seize both her hands, and hold her, and tell her at last what was in his burning heart. But then again came the despairing consciousness that it was all in vain; her voice was angry and menacing; her demeanor was a challenge. "Whatever I did, Barbara," he said, quite humbly, "it was through no wish to injure you; it was far different from that." "And who asked you to intermeddle?" she demanded, with her lips grown pale. "And who made you the judge? Who gave you the right to say what would injure me or not injure me?" "I told you, Barbara," he said, gently--" I told you that I could not stand by and see you being led into a false position through your ignorance of the world. Do you know what people would say--" "I do not care what people would say!" she broke in, sullenly. "Then it is for your friends," said he, with something more of firmness--" if you are so wilful, it is for your friends to see that this man Ogilvie will not take advantage of your recklessness--" "What did you do?" she broke in again. "What have you done? Why does he keep away from us? It is owing to you--it is you that have done it--well I know that!" "He can best tell you himself," Henderson said, calmly, "why he keeps away from you. But a young woman would be more regardful of her character who did not show herself so anxious about the visits of a young man." "My character is my own," said she, hotly, "and I do not wish for friends that have bad suspicions, and that interfere where they are not wanted. I do not wish for such friends. And if you will ...
