"ON my return from a barbarous captivity, (part of which extraordinary sufferings was for your sakes) to Bennington, the latter end of May, 1778, and having received the congratulations of a large circle of friends, and returned them the mutual exchange of compliment and friendship, and had agreeably entertained ourselves in commemorating the surprizing success of the last campaign; the downfall of a whole British army, with a BURGOYNE at their head: And after moving the flowing bowl, expatiated on the ever-memorable battle and victory of Bennington, the forerunner and grand typical figure of the destruction of the Northern army; we then took a retrospective view of our old New-York quarrel, and entered into a discussion on the political events of forming the new State of VERMONT, it then appeared to me to be a very political movement. I have since, upon mature deliberation, expatiated on the good effects which cannot fail of redounding to the inhabitants, in so extensive a frontier country, from the blessings of a well established civil government; and think it worth my trouble to communicate my sentiments and reflections to the public, with a view of encouraging the good and virtuous inhabitants of this State, to persevere and be happy in the further confirming and establishing the same."

This is an edition of a classical book first published in the eighteenth century.
