Not illustrated. 1905 edition. Excerpt: ...up in rearranging the brigades by states. It is intended by the government that he shall have a Virginia brigade as soon as one can be formed for him. In the meanwhile, it is General Lee's desire that General Pryor shall serve upon the Blackwater--his own section of the country--and he directs that the two regiments of cavalry on the Blackwater be placed under his command, etc.... " General Pryor has already won for himself the reputation of being one of the best, most daring, and energetic officers in the army, highly distinguished in civil life, and one of the most influential men in the state, especially in his own section. He will cooperate with you thoroughly, and I am sure will render good service to the cause and be of great assistance to yourself. " I am satisfied, from what General Lee writes me, that at present we can have no troops from his army. The impression is, that a great battle is impending in the vicinity of Fredericksburg. We must keep our house in order, and make the most of the means we have and can procure from other sources than General Lee's army. " Very truly yours, « G. W. Smith, Major-General." A rule enforced for the common good often falls heavily upon individuals. General Pryor grieved to lose his men, and they united in many petitions to be allowed to remain with him. He undertook the protection of the Blackwater region with an inadequate force, in the certain expectation that reinforcements would be sent to him. The enemy destined to conquer us at last--the "ravenous, hunger-starved wolf"--already menaced us. General Longstreet had learned that corn and bacon were stored in the northeastern counties of North Carolina, and he had sent two companies of cavalry on a foraging expedition, to the region around...
